NLRB Publishes Final Rule Fast-Tracking Union Organizing Petitions

Dubbed "the Ambush Election Rule" by some analysts, the final rule seeks to streamline the handling of petitions and limits the "pre-election" administrative action that can be appealed to the NLRB thereby vesting more authority in the hands of hearing officers at the regional office level to handle election petitions.

The bottom line impact: employers will have a short window of time to contest union organizing drives and petitions. Why? Because the rule changes have the operative effect of shortening the window of time between when a petition is filed with the NLRB and when ultimately the union election will take place.
